PLAIN NEEDLEWORK.

BY HELEN HOWE.

The plain portions of lingerie skirts and waists wear out very much quicker than the embroidery or other decoration upon it, as every woman knows, and it is with much regret one frequently has to consent to the ragged waist with embroidery quite good, but which can only be worn again if patched. If women could be made to understand how very simple it is to apply embroidery there would be very little thrown away. Every scrap would be cut out of the garment with a sharp scissors and put into a box for future use. Not always upon a waist again, but as a decoration to collars, cuffs, jabots, the ends of streamers, on sleeves, or, if there is sufficient, as a dress trimming.

The contents of the box could be augmented with scraps and motifs picked up at bargain sales. There would be a boon. If the pieces on hand are quite small they could decorate the corners of a plain handkerchief or a baby's bib. A larger one could be applied to the yoke of a dress for a small child or as a pin cushion.

Larger motifs or a combination of scraps could embellish the front of a waist or result in a pretty corset cover, but there will surely be found a use for every one of them, large or small.

When ready to apply the surplus material it is cut away evenly and smoothly, and the motif laid in place and pinned. The next step is to run the material to be decorated, or one might run a machine stitch all around. The material and motif are covered with a buttonhole stitch, the Kensington stitch, or, in the case of very heavy embroidery, as a decorative border, that has been cut away without leaving a bit of margin, these can be applied by running the machine stitch on the extreme edge.

Another good way of applying motifs when the outline is fairly well defined is to leave a very little margin, just enough to stitch down strongly, and then outline the motif with a decorative couching stitch. This is a really handsome bit of work when done neatly, and gives the best results in regard to time and trouble.
